For example, if your child loves dump trucks, make sure you have a few of those lying around. It’s much less clear-cut with a toddler, as there are an almost infinite number of things they will enjoy! 3. Make it a game You’ve brought everything you thought your toddler needed – they have a peek at your purchases, they played with the toys for a bit and it’s time to pick out their favourite. Instead of presenting them with a selection of items and asking them which you should buy, instead sit them on a chair next to you, invite them to choose some things that you have wrapped up and open up the parcel. They get to choose which object they would like to take home, and you can watch to see if it creates a positive memory for them. Chances are, it will. (Bonus points if they pick one of the toys you had in mind when you were shopping!) 4. Make it fun Now that you've got the atmosphere set and your toddler is engaged in the process of choosing which toy to take home, it's important to be aware of any entertainment options that might benefit from your involvement. Although this stage is all about your child's imagination, they do love a good bit of physical activity! It's great if you can mimic some of the things they love – for
